VIRGINIA. FRIDAY, April 14.

GRANT AND LEE—A TOURNAMENT OF DEATH.—The world's special says: It is reported that as soon as Lee decided that he would have to surrender, he set to work to devise some plan by which action on his part would result in peace. What passed at the interview between him and Grant is not publicly known, but from subsequent occurrences, it may be easily inferred that the terms of surrender were but a minor portion of the questions discussed.

It is quite probable he proposed to Grant that he would surrender, and that Grant would grant himself to General Johnston and urge him to surrender likewise. In furtherance of his plan, Grant was to go to Washington and urge a stoppage of the fighting, and the issue of an amnesty proclamation, while Grant would go to Richmond and urge Johnston to surrender. The Times' special says: Grant was in main in Washington several days. The Herald's Richmond dispatch says: It is known here by the thousands, and so on, that the fallen chieftain that was obliged to surrender. They would not leave the South with him.

The Herald's army correspondent says: The first meeting of Grant and Lee was private for a few moments, when the staff officers were admitted. Lee was in a military dress in gray cloth, without ornaments. During the interview he was most courteous, and said many things of a mortification. He bivouacked the night in a grove near by, and in the morning breakfasted on a corn dodger. No one but a few of his officers suspected that he contained surrendering his army.

The Times' correspondent says: Lee asked Gen. Grant to explain what was meant by personal effects, and said many of his officers owned their horses. Grant said the horses must be turned over to the United States, which Lee admitted was entirely correct. But Grant said he would instruct his officers to allow those men who owned horses to retain them, as they would need them to till the farms.

Lee expressed great gratification for the generous consideration, and said it would have a good effect. Lee couldn't tell how many he had surrendered, but he thought he had killed and deserted. Lee informed Grant that his men were short of provisions, whereupon the latter ordered 250,000 rations to be sent to him.

When Lee announced the liberal terms he had secured to his officers, they expressed great satisfaction. The troops receive the announcement with enthusiasm. After an hour of friendly intercourse took place between the officers of the two armies.

The Times' correspondent says, that in skirmish—General Grant, on our side, at General Deering on the rebel side—met, in full view of the forces, led a tournament of death, fighting with pistols, until, almost simultaneously, they fell dead, and were lying mortally wounded.

The Tribune's special says: Gen. Grant on his way to Washington, said he would demonstrate to the Government that military expenses may now be reduced $1,000,000 a day without infringing at all upon its necessary economy.

Gen. Lee is expected to be present at a convention of the Virginia Legislature.

The Herald's Washington special says: Grant represents Lee as a zealous and efficient officer, and that he is a man of great energy and ability.

Lee considers his work as important, and Grant did his in coming to Washington to reduce the expenses of the Government.

It appears that Jeff. Davis sent a messenger to inquire of Grant whether the Government would allow him to leave the country, never to return. Grant's reply was that his business was to fight the rebellion, and that he would not leave the country until it was subdued.

It also appears that Jeff. Davis and other rebel officers were interested in the blockade-running business, and had made handsome fortunes.

PERSONAL. CINCINNATI, April 14.—General Carrington publishes a card, saying the charges against him are infamous attempts to obliterate the credit of his services in Indiana.
